Excerpt: . . . the state of knowledge in Socrates times, and in our own. Each period may be considered a transition state from a relaxing, authority to a more fully established conviction. The Politician, requiring obligations to prevent the dissolution of all the bonds of society; the Speculatist, desiring to know how far he may urge his theories without danger to practice; and the Religious, anxious to prevent beliefsinking into scepticism, and devotion being chilled into irreligion, may find much that deserves his attention in the conduct and motives of Socrates. For the very end of Socrates philosophy is to fix important objects, and to develop sufficient motives to excite men to pursue them. Socrates investigated human nature for principles, and examined human affairs for consequences; and ascended, by the soundest inferences of reason, and the purest dictates of conscience, to a still higher obligation. He desired...
