Mrs. Cecile White Fleming and Mr. W. E. Uphaus assisted in the organization and tabulation of the data. H. L. Smith, Dean of the School of Education. A Cooperative Study of Reading in Sixteen Cities of Indiana Introductory Statement During the winter of 1916-17 the Bureau of Cooperative Research of Indiana University conducted an investigation of the results secured thru reading instruction in sixteen school systems of Indiana. Reading was chosen for investigation because teachers and supervisors alike recognize that it is a subject of first importance in the elementary school curriculum. In the lower grades, ability to read is frequently accepted as the most important factor in determining promotion. In the upper grades, ability to read content subjects independently and intelligently is prerequisite to rapid progress. At the same time that increasing recognition has been given to the importance of reading, numerous questions have been asked by progressive supervisors and teachers of Indiana concerning the specific outcomes of reading instruction. The following questions are typical: Do the pupils develop as rapidly as they should in the acquisition of reading ability? Which phases of reading are well taught and which are poorly taught as judged by the results secured? Which phases of reading instruction receive most emphasis? What changes should be made in present methods of instruction to improve the...
